

California Casino News

October 12-18, 2020

COLUMN: Let's rethink Trinidad hotel proposal, before it's too late

Click here to view article

If you drill a well for your own household use, a shallow well might be good enough, although you still have to conform to public health water quality standards. The standards are more stringent for water that will be used by the public – as in a hotel, for example. And they should be stricter, of course. Who would want hotel guests getting sick from contaminated water in their oceanfront rooms?

California casino back from cyberattack, but two others possibly hit

Data forensic experts continue to work with staff at the Cache Creek Casino in California to determine if the cyberattack the casino suffered last month led to the loss of any customer data. The FBI has been helping with the investigation and, although no updates have yet been released, the casino is back in business.

Click here to view article

After San Diego casinos reopened, little known about their COVID-19 numbers

Click here to view article

As many businesses remained under orders to stay closed during the coronavirus pandemic, tribes in San Diego County bucked recommendations from outside leaders and reopened their casinos with measures designed to limit the spread of illness. It's unclear if the gamble paid off.